Hi Hope,

Wanted to alert you I'm working on a story that could run as soon as tomorrow about California officials contending in recent weeks that they've been left out of discussions between White House officials, EPA officials and auto makers on the midterm evaluation of emissions/fuel-economy standards. The story will also point out that the administration intends to reach out soon to the California Air Resources Board to discuss setting up future discussions. The context is California is a critical player in this midterm evaluation because of their EPA waiver to set rules deviating from U.S. regulations that other states follow and their previous agreement with the One National Program on emissions/fuel-economy and displeasure that the midterm evaluation was reopened.

Let me know and thanks in advance...

Best,
Mike
